The Aquae Flaviae of Roman times, Chaves is located in the heart of the Trás-os-Montes mountain range. It is one of the most important Portuguese spas, as its waters are the hottest in Europe.

The exceptional quality of its springs, which include the Alto Tâmega thermal channel, was the reason why Aquae Flaviae was one of the most flourishing Iberian cities of the Roman period.

Chaves medicinal mineral water is bicarbonated, rich in minerals, especially sodium, silica, fluoride and hydrogen. By its temperature, is called hyperthermal and its main action is to stimulate the metabolic and physiological functions because of its mineralization. It has high anti-inflammatory and analgesic action is descontracturant and facilitates joint function.
